STOP SEXUAL ABUSE Ways to Keep Kids Safe

- Educate your child about safe and unsafe touching. Use correct names for body parts so there's no confusion if an issue arises.
- Teach that your child is the boss of his or her body. Your child decides what touches make him or her uncomfortable.
- Encourage your child to speak up if someone makes him or her feel strange. Take seriously any talk of being abused. Get help immediately if there is an issue.
- Become acquainted with the people in your child's life, this should include parents of friends, coaches, teachers, and leaders of any organizations in which your child is active.
- Leave your child only in the care of people you know well and trust. Make sure babysitters have references and are responsible.
- Know your child's whereabouts at all times. Be aware of whom he or she is with and when your child will be home.
- Learn the signs of abuse. These include depression self-harm, and changes in behavior.
- Give your child constant love, support, praise, and show interest in his or her life. Feeling safe, loved, and comfortable talking to you is essential to your child's well-being
